

"The Dog That Didn't Bite"

On the USS Missouri in Tokyo Harbor, General Douglas MacArthur speaks in front of the victorious Allies at the formal signing of surrender by Japan. Hundreds of bombers and fighters fly over the docked ships as an emaciated General Jonathan Wainwright stands at attention near his boss, his friend MacArthur.

At a dock in Kowloon, Hong Kong, Major Robert Perry steps off a small military boat into the arms of his Chinese wife and their large family and proud relatives.

On his estate in Tokyo, Dr. Shiro Ishii struggles in fear to bury metal boxes full of Unit 731 documents.

One year after the war ends, Anderson is on a golf course in Maryland with friends, he is finally having a good time and laughing again. After some hunch in the clubhouse Anderson decides to drive home.

As he passes by the front gate of Fort Detrick, a biological weapons base. He is stopped by a military motorcade arriving at the base. In one of the cars in the motorcade, Anderson spots several doctors from Unit 731 who had visited Mukden POW Camp during the war. One of the doctors recognizes Anderson but quickly looks away and hides his face.

Anderson is filled with shock, distress, then anger at seeing these doctors from Unit 731, who were notorious for their involvement in monstrous human experiments and sadistic atrocities during the war.

Anderson composes himself and continues driving. While driving, he begins to cry and has a series of flashbacks to his wartime experiences, including the Bataan Death March, Cabanatuan POW Camp, Hell Ships, and the Mukden POW Camp. The flashbacks include memories of freezing bodies, the MKK munitions plant, prisoner executions, and the OSS liberating Mukden. He also remembers the faces of Unit 731 doctors torturing Chinese and Allied prisoners.

Anderson suddenly awakes from these intense flashbacks when he arrives at his suburban house. His wife and child come out to greet him. Despite the distressing memories, Anderson is now filled with happiness. He hugs and kisses his wife and child as they walk to the house, feeling relieved and grateful to be home.
